An Accident.

The dwarfed appearance of the Gazette this evening is due to necessary repairs on the boiler which furnishes motive power. Work was commenced Saturday evening, and will be completed tonight. The sheet to-morrow will be back to its accustomed size, and well developed. "Accidents sometimes happen in well-regulated families." Our readers will pardon us for suggesting this old "saw" as an apology; but it applies to our condition just now, better than anything else that comes to mind. Our windmill is all right, but we are short of steam.

A LITTLE INCIDENT.

How a Child was Mysteriously Saved from Death.—A Graphic Scene Witnessed by a Janesville Tourist.

The night express on the Rock Island road, was speeding west at the rate of twenty-five miles an hour one warm July morning, when suddenly the passengers were startled by the shrill alarm whistle as it sounded out on the warm morning air, in quick, sharp tones that indicated danger ahead. Slowly the long train came to a stop in the middle of a high-tracked bridge and as the passengers on the rear sleeper stepped out on the platform, and looked down forty feet to a little stream that was singing along on its way to the Missouri river, a few miles away, their attention was attracted to a little colored girl and a dog who stood beside a bundle of something that lay quietly on the grassy bank of the stream. The engineer came back and said excitedly, "Do you see the little girl? I wonder if she is dead?" and quickly he pushed on to the end of the bridge, followed by a number of interested occupants of the car. Climbing down the steep embankment and stumbling over stones and brush, the little group was soon reached, and tenderly lifting up the bundle and throwing back the old shawl which covered it, there appeared the face of a little colored girl, her eyes were closed, and no sign of life appeared. Carefully the strong man carried her up the bank followed by the other little girl and dog, and the passengers who had accompanied him. Along the bridge to the sleeping car, they soon found their way, and when the little burden was placed on one of the wide velvet cushioned seats, and slowly opened her eyes in startled surprise, a feeling of relief and joy came over the anxious watchers, and when a moment later consciousness was fully restored, and she sat up and asked in a little timid voice, where she was and how she came there, the engineer hastily brushed away a tear with his big rough hand and said in a whisper that was hardly noticed, "Thank God she's all right." A moment later he was gone, and soon the train was swinging along towards its destination.

A casual examination of the little girl failed to reveal any broken bones, and in a few minutes the two children and dog, occupied the rear platform of the sleeper and were enjoying their first ride on the Pullman-car.

When the Missouri river was reached half an hour later, the train left the train apparently as happy as though nothing unusual had happened.

Curiously prompted an interview with the engineer, who was found at his post of duty and in answer to an inquiry about the accident on the bridge, he said, "You see, this is how it happened. When I came out of the car, a hundred yards beyond the embankment, I noticed two little girls on the middle of the trestle work, and when I gave the danger signal they seemed paralyzed with fright, and stood perfectly still. I threw my clear over, and put on the steam brakes, but all to no purpose, for we were on the down grade, and in a moment more would be on them. Suddenly one of them climbed down on the frame work of the bridge, and the other, clasped her little hands around one of the rails and hung suspended over the creek below. Just before we reached there I saw the little hands, and supposed of course that they were cut off and the child must certainly be killed by the fall, but it seems that she loosened her hold just in time, but how she escaped death, after that kind of a fall, is one of the mysteries that I never try to explain."

The conductor's "all aboard" ended the conversation, and the train was soon lost to sight.

How to Sleep.

Many people have an idea that the most comfortable place to sleep is in church, and there is no question but that the church is a most comfortable place to sleep in. A great deal of comfort from a good corner of a well cushioned pew, but some people never attend divine service, and a good many others who do, manage to keep awake from the opening voluntary to the amen which follows the benediction. Everybody, however, spends more or less time during every twenty-four hours in happy unconsciousness and the question of a comfortable position is worth considering.

A friend residing in the second ward recently had an experience which contains some valuable hints to sleepers in general and men of domestic circumstances in particular. He is a wide awake, go ahead fellow during the day, but when night comes and he consents himself to sleep, all other business is suspended and a brass band suit door would be only a mild accompaniment to the melody of his gentle breathing. His wife is a patient little body, and when Jonathan starts out on a night concert lying flat on his back with mouth wide open, and snoring like a
